Personal Essay

The lessons we take from obstacles we encounter can be fundamental to later success. Recount a time when you faced a challenge, setback, or failure. How did it affect you, and what did you learn from the experience?

"Sh...sh...she said..." - I struggled to read the paragraph assigned to me during English class that day. On most days, I would become so heavily burdened by discouragement the moment I began to stutter, that I had to nudge my deskmate to finish the paragraph on my behalf. That day was no different.

English classes slowly evolved into my worst class. This was mainly because unlike Mathematics where I would simply write down my answer and present it to the teacher, English required that I spoke up: or at least made way with my stammering.

I once wrote a note to my English teacher with details of questions I had, but instead of reading them, he forced me to speak up so the whole class could benefit from it. 'How would they even benefit if they could barely get what I was saying?', I thought to myself.

The silence that prevailed in the room as I prepared to speak poisoned my speech. I could barely make it past the first word, no matter how many times I had tried to start over. Staring at the rest of the class, I found myself with an additional challenge of fighting back the tears in my eyes. What my 9-year-old self resorted to doing when the tears increased, was the usual- passing the question to my deskmate and taking a seat as I wiped my tears.

For a long time after that, I looked down on myself because of my stammering. I digressed into that quiet student who sat at the back of the class and hardly made eye contact with her classmates. Whenever one of my classmates approached me for a discussion, I just nodded or shook my head then acted busy to cut the conversation short. A great day was one that didn't include a single instance of my stutter.

As Deepak Surana said, "Running away from a problem will only increase the distance from the solution." My stutter only worsened with time. From only having trouble with the sounds "sh" and "th", I also started having difficulties pronouncing "m", "ch" and "d". I could barely get through a word without stuttering.

After this development, I knew I had to change my tactic lest my pronunciation never improves. During my break times, I set aside 15 minutes of playing time for reading 5 pages of a novel aloud to a tree. At first, my reading pace was no different from that of a young child trying to read, but with time, my pace started increasing, albeit slowly at first. Soon after, I gained enough courage to invite my closest friend, who eventually invited some of her other friends, to my reading sessions. After two months of this routine, I was finally ready to speak in front of people.

Not only did my class participation improve, but I also joined some debate clubs to challenge myself more. With the help of some of my teammates, I came up with some tricks to minimize my stutter during debates. Sometimes these tricks failed, and during such times, I resorted to slowing down the pace of my speech until I could regain my composure. I could no longer let my stutter stop me from delivering my points to the audience.

I remember looking at my deskmate during the last English class of that year and smiling because I no longer had to tap him to be my spokesman out of fear that I would expose my weakness. My heart was filled with joy because as I stared at him, my hand was raised, hoping that my teacher would pick me to read the extra paragraph of the day.

I still find myself stuttering - whether it's in pronunciations or challenging situations - but I learned my lesson very early on-I would rather fight through the obstacles than run away.

In Kenya, high school graduates must wait for a period of 10 months before joining college. After completing high school I nursed my grandfather, who has been suffering from a brain tumor, at our village home in Kakamega as I waited for my results which came out in late December.

In January, I took up a short course in International Computer Driving Licence(ICDL) for 7 weeks after which I began my internship at Equity Bank Limited towards the end of February.

At Equity, I worked as a Customer Relations Officer, offering financial assistance and advice to at least 100 customers a day. This continued for 7 weeks before my contract was terminated at the end of March due to COVID-19.

In April, I was appointed a peer counselor for the ICC (International Christians' Centre) Master's Commission, a program that oversees the mentorship of high school students. Following my appointment, I mentored a group of 24 students for 4 weeks.

On completion of the 4 weeks, I explored my artistic side by starting a blog on mental health awareness. This was inspired by one of the discussions I had with my mentees regarding depression, anxiety, and self-acceptance. I also read a lot of books during this time, my favorite being, "Girl Wash Your Face," by Rachell Flatts.

Currently, I am tutoring a group of 12 high school mentees, whose schools were shut down at the onset of the pandemic, in Mathematics and Physics.
