Personal Essay

Some students have a background, identity, interest, or talent that is so meaningful they believe their application would be incomplete without it. If this sounds like you, then please share your story.

Like a day

Sometimes I am jealous of the avocado tree outside. The most that is expected of it is to bear fruits. It faces no fear of privation of anything. The earth and heavens are munificent in bequeathing its needs. Its towering branches give off shamrock green leaves which extensively cover the right margin of our roof. The fresh leafy smell it gives pervades our house and is dominant especially in the morning.

Morning. I was ambivalent that morning when I was called in from play to pack my clothes. I was happy that the midnight bangs on our door would end but I was sad about leaving the only home I had known for the past ten years of my existence. Crumbled up on the back seat of the truck with my brother, a piece of cutlery from the box above us fell on my small toe perhaps a premonition of the doom ahead.

"Your father lost his job today and we were forced out because bad people don't want him there," my mother tried to demystify the gravity of the matter while unloading things from the blue Canter truck. My father's employment contract had been terminated and we were forced to vacate the teachers' quarters. My father was never the one to deliver the bad news. His face read of a resolution to move on yet it portrayed the uncertainty of how this would happen. Maybe it was her intractable will in the face of adversity and his ever-optimistic nature that kept them together.

Afternoon. I tried to stifle my sobs that afternoon as I left with my maternal grandmother with my beige woolen bag strapped on my back. Silent because I wanted to act strong so as not to grieve my already hurting parents. The last two weeks after moving into the wooden make-shift house had been arduous. We had stopped attending school as my parents struggled to make ends meet. One of us had to leave for the others to, at the very least, fit in the house.

Three weeks into my stay at my grandmother's place I woke up to loud noises from the main house. I dashed there and one of my aunts stopped me at the door. The deafening silence spoke volumes; she needn't have said a word. My grandmother had died due to heart failure. She was buried by the huge avocado tree in her compound. As she was being lowered into the rectangular gaping hole on the ground I remembered the conversation we had had on her last night. "You can make it better for everyone," she had told me in between my whimpers.

Two days later I went back with my parents the same woolen bag strapped on my back, a slight tear on its left strap indicative of passing of time. We got used to the situation. "Own it and it will no longer nag you" was the philosophy I came up with. We changed schools to a more affordable public school. We'd carry home-made groundnuts to sell to the other students in school. I took all the giggles from my classmates about my torn pair of shorts or missing socks in bravely.

Evening. I recall that evening vividly. It was the first time in seven months I had seen my father happy. He had been reinstated after being found innocent of the allegations of incitement leveled against him. I knew the nightmare would end. It had all been like a day; a morning which was a preamble to the ordeal, an afternoon that perpetuated it and an evening that brought relief.

I stand by the avocado tree as the sun sets. As the soft evening wind blows in between the leaves, I hear the words "You can make it better." As I pluck a fruit from the tree I reckon that I can truly make it better.

Required Explanation

Education progression

Immediately after graduation from high school, I engaged in two weeks of community service through an organization known as the Fountains of Christ. I was primarily engaged in the tutoring of Primary school kids through the weeks and assisting in a medical camp that was being run in the program.

At the close of the year, the KCSE results were released and I was the eighth top student in the country. This came with the auspicious opportunity to join the Equity Leaders Program, one of the most selective programs in the country for high school graduates. This gave me the opportunity to intern with the Equity Bank, Kisii branch for seven months where I worked in the accounts opening, cash department and financial literacy program which was aimed at training local women in financial literacy.

I have also served as a mentor with the Wings To Fly program, a program that helps high achieving students from financially disadvantaged backgrounds to pay their way through high school. I have been actively involved in mentoring five high school students in two local schools whereby I have seen them progressively improve in their academics as a result.

I have also participated in two science projects in the New York Academy of Sciences. One was in applying Genomics to better curb diseases and the other in coming up with ways of accelerating recovery of countries hit by natural calamities.

EC Essay

We set out to the Kenyatta National Hospital's pediatric ward. This is our group's first visit to the hospital. The day out with the children turned out to be successful and a call to introspection for me. We covered many of the walls with post-its with messages of swift recovery for the children, engaged them in play all through the day and spoke with the parents of the children. As I moved around from ward to ward talking to the children and parents I realized something. Some kind of pure fulfillment stems from reaching out to those in need. Making friends with a child with a terminal disease, promising to visit them again soon; all this done willingly because as I left he was excited and with a hope that he did not have that morning.

This is why I go to the same pediatric ward once every month.
