Personal Essay

Discuss an accomplishment, event, or realization that sparked a period of personal growth and a new understanding of yourself or others.

Where was everyone?

The clouds burst out into a cry; a heavy rainfall. Few droplets spluttered on my face as I stared out of the broken window. A single crow flapped its wings on her lonely grave; it seemed angry that we had all forgotten her burial anniversary. As I gazed at the Mugumo tree stump over her gravestone, memories from my childhood flooded my mind.

The perfect image of my grandmother and me sitting underneath its glorious shade, stringing conversations to the hour of the setting sun.

"It was here that you said your first words," I recalled the melody in her voice. The scars on my forearm spoke volumes of my childhood escapades that mostly preceded a prodigious spanking.

"It is not you I am punishing, it is the mistake," her voice rung in my mind. It had been ten years of pain. Pain and loneliness. Loneliness and grief; but like all things, it too did not last forever. Soon after she was consumed by the hungry earth, I realized life has to move on. However, what I did not realize was that her sound counsel would sail me through the course of time.

"Be like the Mugumo tree, ever strong. Let your large and long branches spread in the world," she always asserted pointing at the tree. Her words rung deep in my soul every time I started to falter. My feet cracked and bled as I walked barefoot to school. Sharing books with those fortunate enough to have one was nearly impossible, thus I had to sketch quick notes to keep up. Despite all this, I had to keep moving forward, for her. My painful rendition of the songs she taught me under the tree flowed through the school hallways, and teaching them to all who would listen was like hitting a perfect trifecta. I always dished out her words to students every chance I got, hopefully leading one or two into a brighter future.

"You can get what you want or you can just get old," she always said. The big city school stood massive as I walked towards the already full graduation square. I remember waking up every day more tired than I had slept, eager though, to complete my studies. All the nights I spent working on Biology projects for the school had paid off. I remembered raising my hand at almost every question in class, working hard to ensure I did her proud. I looked at the results slip clasped tightly in my hand and burst with joy.

"Mburu!" my fellow graduates broke my line of thought as we smiled at the photographer for our yearbook picture. High school was finally over.

I returned to the village a hero. 'The boy who went to the city to read' they called me. Wearing spectacles, to most of them, was already a sign of success. If they only knew the deeper story, the story of the Mugumo tree and my grandmother's words that had molded me to such heights. This inspiring tale of the boy who had dreams of studying abroad despite his poor background. I could not believe it either, at how far I had come. I wanted to spread my story to the world, become a scientific researcher in Biology and come back home to inspire others to do the same. Her words would certainly do the world some good, and I wanted to be the one to spread it.

The garden door creaked open and I turned quickly, hoping that at least one of the villagers had come to remember her. The wind had blown in a bunch of leaves. It was a sign, I hoped as they brushed against the tree stump, a sign that the end was not as bleak. The crow flaps its wings against the wind. It sings a song, "This was her favorite anniversary."
