Dear Admissions Committee,

RE: COUNSELOR RECOMMENDATION FOR NEKOYE JOAN OMUKAGA, ADM-2938

It is with great honor that I take this opportunity to recommend Joan Nekoye for undergraduate admission into your institution. I have known Nekoye for the last 4 years and have doubled as both her School counselor and her teacher of English during her first two years in high school. As someone who has witnessed her growth both within and outside the classroom, I would describe Nekoye as a pleasant, passionate and brilliant individual who thrives in an intellectually explorative environment and has the innate leadership ability to transform whatever she lays her hands on.

Once, during a literature lesson with her class, I had asked everyone to name their favorite book and why it was their favorite. Sure enough, most of the students named set books that they had read in primary school but not Nekoye. Her favorite book was Half of a Yellow Sun by Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie. If her taste in books impressed me, then her level of comprehension and reiteration of the message to the class blew me away. Her explanation of the concept of overcoming challenges according to the book was truly profound and well put out that I felt as if I had read the book myself. She exuded mastery and open-minded thinking that was uncommon for a junior high school student.

It soon became evident that her abilities did not lie solely in literature. She piqued the interest of many of her teachers and they would often describe her as an apt, creative and well-spoken student with high curiosity and aptitude for math, science, and humanities. This manifested itself over the years as Nekoye continuously became a common name in the school assembly because she had either won a math contest, topped in a science and engineering fair or begun a club that championed for students' rights. I believe that this was possible because she managed to combine her intellectual abilities with passion, self-drive and discipline.

Interestingly, Nekoye was among the few students I have met who successfully managed to combine sociability with intellectual vitality. Anywhere she was she managed to either make friends or influence the crowd in one way or another. She was a charming student, to say the least. Her refined social skills paired up with her leadership skills drove her to make a significant impact on the school student body. She took part in voluntary work for all the years she was with us and inspired others to join her in giving back to society by visiting the local hospital and children's home. She was also instrumental in highlighting student depression, mental health awareness, sexual health, and environmentalism within the student body. She did this through a social activism club that she passionately led for the last two years of her high school career.

Nekoye definitely stood out as an exemplary and dynamic student. I am confident that she will make a difference and add value to your institution as she aspires to do the same globally.

Yours sincerely,

Rev. Florence Aseka
