RE: RECOMMENDATION FOR EZRA SIKUTA KIZITO- ADMISSION NO. 9093

It is with great enthusiasm and pleasure that I recommend Ezra Kizito for a place in your esteemed institution. Ezra's passion for history and government, along with his ability to initiate and maintain meaningful discussions in and out of the classroom, makes him a memorable student, and one who I'm eager to tell you about.

During his time at high school, Ezra's love for history shone through his performance and demeanor in class. Not only did he have one of the most impressive academic records that I have seen in my career as a history teacher (he never scored below 90% in any history exams and assessments after his first year), but he also possessed a curiosity that drove him to search avidly for information beyond the prescribed books, gleaning information from any source he could.

Ezra's engagement in academic spaces is, however, his strongest attribute in my opinion, and is what I came to primarily associate with him as he progressed through high school. He showed a remarkably strong ability to contribute to a wide range of conversations in history. I always felt that he was well informed on various historical topics and current affairs, which led to a lot of intriguing discussions between me and him that extended beyond lessons. I particularly recall a discussion during one lunch break on Pan-Africanism, where Ezra gave his thoughts on the role of trade unions and other nationalist movements in its spread, and how this affected its effectiveness in the long run. This conversation is one of many where Ezra displayed his unique intellectual maturity and a keen observation of social, political and economic aspects of the community.

Aside from merely contributing, he had a knack for initiating and leading these conversations regarding different aspects of history. His thought-provoking questions tended to spark debates that made history lessons very interesting and worth looking forward to, especially as a teacher. It didn't matter where the conversation was, either. During a visit to the Kenyan parliament buildings during a history field trip, Ezra asked several difficult questions to some of the senior government staff present, leading to a comprehensive walkthrough of the legislature's workings, and a subsequent discussion on the same as we journeyed back to school that evening, that undoubtedly left the class—and myself—more knowledgeable than we would have been had Ezra not asked them.

These attributes led me to naturally rely on Ezra to lead the student-oriented discussions that are an important part of our history curriculum, particularly in the fourth year of high school when students are preparing for their final exams. Ezra took up this responsibility with poise, and his passion and curiosity spread infectiously throughout the classroom. His positive influence was also as a result of his charismatic personality, which, according to his classmates, made him friendly, approachable and willing to work with others. I saw this first hand when Ezra, on multiple occasions, volunteered to help other students revise the course material and shared his thoughts and tips freely with his classmates.

Based on my knowledge of him, I dare say that Ezra is the kind of student who has the ability to improve all those around him, peers and teachers alike, and will be a remarkable addition to your campus. I therefore confidently advocate for him as he seeks admission into your institution.

Yours sincerely,

Richard Mwai,
Teacher of History
